Having read all of the proposals and the reasoning behind them, and the promises of coordination, study, assistance to the public and the rest, I am left with the belief that our government has metastasized into a completely opaque, expensive and unmanageable enterprise.

No one can believe, having followed the last 20 years of growth of public agencies, that the promises of benefits will not be overwhelmed by massive agency costs, obscure and overreaching regulations, and frequently impenetrable bad judgement for which there is no remedy.

As a citizen, having watched these exercises, I am opposed to the development of this agency. The problem described is not so great as to justify the bloated bureaucracy which will ultimately flow from one more advance in the size and complexity of our unresponsive government.

Sincerely
